This research analyzes discrimination against Muslims in South Korea, a country known for its technological and economic advancement. Various factors influence this discrimination, including anti-Muslim propaganda, a lack of understanding of Islam, and religious-based terrorism events in the world. In recent years, 2018-2023, human rights discrimination against the Muslim community in South Korea has become a public concern. In South Korea, discrimination against Muslims leads to human rights violations as well as hatred. The complexity of this problem is further amplified by the interaction of various factors, social changes, and the dynamics of life in South Korea. This research uses a qualitative approach and case studies to understand this phenomenon from the perspective of the perpetrators and victims of discrimination, involving local South Koreans and Muslims living in South Korea. The results show that there are significant influences from various parties that affect the occurrence of direct and indirect acts of human rights discrimination against Muslims in South Korea so that it greatly impacts the human rights of Muslims living in South Korea.
